“The Teaching Commons has raised York University’s reputation internationally, as members of the Centre have leadership roles provincially, nationally and internationally. In my discussions with York University faculty, staff, and students, it is clear that they see the Teaching Commons as an institutional hub for culture change and the lynch pin to bring everyone together in the critical teaching and learning mandate of the institution.”

Dr. Erika Kustra, University of Windsor

“York University has been instrumental in providing leadership in teaching and learning, not only on the York campus but provincially and nationally. The teaching centre staff, in particular, have consistently been at the helm of innovative projects and programming which have contributed significantly to graduate student and faculty development, and to the wider educational development community in countless ways.”
